The Student Experience Project is a collaborative of university leaders, faculty, researchers and national education and improvement organizations who are committed to innovative, evidence-based practices that increase degree attainment by transforming the college student experience and creating equitable learning environments.

To reach these goals, the SEP’s first effort is to find clear, targeted steps that faculty and administrators can take to support students in STEM coursework and classrooms, creating replicable models to build community in college and foster a sense of belonging for students from all disciplines and backgrounds.

Tackling Inequities in College Education

Why Are There Disparities in Graduation Rates?

Research shows that college readiness and financial security are not the only factors fueling disparities in college graduation rates. A student’s lived experience can impact how confidently that student navigates college life—everything from finances to final exams. Low-income students, students of color, and first-generation students are most likely to experience the social and academic challenges of college as reinforcing the perception that they do not “belong” in higher education.

How Can We Help Every Student Persist To Find Success In College?

As our K-12 education system works to prepare students for their future and as our nation grapples with how to make college more affordable, institutions of higher education must also take action to ensure that every student knows they belong on campus and are supported to pursue their degree aspirations. Over a decade of research in social psychology demonstrates that positive experiences of community, belonging, and academic support on campus and in the classroom can increase a student’s likelihood of persisting through academic challenges toward graduation.

The SEP’s mission is to find strategies to transform the college student experience so that every student feels a sense of belonging and receives the support and resources necessary to persist and succeed.

Who Is The SEP?

The SEP began as a partnership between six national education organizations committed to tackling inequities in college education:

The Raikes Foundation convened six universities and colleges across the United States to collaborate and transform the college student experience:

The SEP is also proud to work with a number of other institutions of higher education who make up the SEP Peer Learning Network. For more information on our partners, please visit studentexperienceproject.org/about.
